How the End Will Come.
The professor of natural phenomena had acquired a gasoline car. "The day is coming," he said to his class a few weeks later, "when the tire will sag and punctures pierce the inner tube and the casing blister—and then this old earth of ours will have a blowout that may shake the Dog Star from its keel and hurl the Dipper to kingdom come!"

WAITING FOR PATTY

By T. B. EATON.

Taps, his intimates called him—Taps Scudder. He was big, more than passably good looking, had a splendid income quite outside his pay, and was a lieutenant, junior grade, in the navy.

Orders had come detaching him from duty at the yard and instructing him to join the Comorant for sea duty.

He stood on the steps of the admiral's house—the admiral was commandant of the navy yard—a scowl on his face and a heart within him like several tons of lead. Evelyn Howland, the admiral's daughter, had just refused him again, and tomorrow he would be at sea for he knew not how many years. The Comorant was headed for the Philippines.

Still scowling, he began to walk down the path. A syringa bush on the little lawn was in full bloom.

Behind the syringa bush sounded a childish voice singing a popular song. It ceased as he moved down the path, and Patty Howland, with all the impulsiveness of a dozen years coupled with very strong likes and dislikes, sped from behind the bush and threw herself into Taps Scudder's arms.

"Oh, Taps," she cried, "are you really going away tomorrow?"

"Tonight, Patty," said he, smiling down at her. "We sail tomorrow."

"And you've just been up to see Evelyn?"

He nodded.

"And she turned you down again?"

"That's not a nice way of putting it," he chided mildly.

"Well, did she?" she persisted. "You needn't answer, Taps. I see it in that scowl of yours. And you look hurt and angry, too. Did she say she'd marry you if you'd leave the service?"

He smiled rather wanly.

"I'm not going to."

"You're sailing tomorrow on the Comorant," said he.

"Well, don't you leave the service, Taps—not for Evelyn nor anybody else," she said.

"Why?" he asked.

"Oh, well, for one thing just because, and for another because you are so awfully, awfully handsome in a uniform."

"That last is the best reason, Patty," he laughed. "Just for that I won't leave the service."

"Well, don't. Promise me you won't."

"I promise."

He stooped. She lifted her pretty, childish face and kissed him resoundingly, not once, but over and over.

Then he went on down the path, the incident forgotten. He was scowling again and his heart was sore within him. Evelyn Howland, had, indeed, intimated this last afternoon that if he would leave the service she would marry him.

The next day he sailed on the Comorant. And it was a very depressed Taps Scudder that cruised about the Philippines.

He wrote Evelyn often—it seemed to be his only solace, that waiting impatiently for the letters from her. They were all of the same general trend. Why did he stay in the service, especially when he had plenty of money? He couldn't really care very much for her if he wouldn't leave the service for her sake.

Taps read those letters and bit his lips and paced the hot deck, and six years went past in this way.

Then he was ordered home, and the waters did not foam and his half loudly enough beneath the homeward pointing prow to suit him.

Evelyn was still heart-free, if he could believe her letters, and in a few weeks now he would see her.

During his absence Rear Admiral Howland had reached the age limit and been retired. He now lived in an imposing house in an exclusive suburb near the navy yard.

No sooner was he landed than Taps Scudder headed thither. It was a splendid house, with spacious grounds and a large, low rambling house set among Lombardy poplars.

Taps stood at the wide gates admiring it. The carriage which had brought him, thither was rattling back toward the little suburban station.

A motor car came whirling into the driveway. A horn beeped its strident warning. He turned about. There was a cry from the car; instantly it stopped.

"Oh, Taps, Taps, dear, I'm so glad to see you—so, so glad!"

He looked at her dazedly. He could not realize the change in her that six years had wrought. Could this be the little spindle-shanked girl he had left behind the syringa bush at the navy yard? He muttered in bewildered fashion:

"Patty! For goodness' sake—Patty!"

"You've grown handsome, Taps," she declared. "Why, you're awfully distinguished looking—not so boyish as you were. Aren't you glad you stayed in the service?"

"You bet I am, if I get my reward for it," said he.

"What was that?" said she.

"Do I have to ask you?" said he.

"No. Frankly, you don't," she declared. "I've remembered it every day and every hour since you left. But I didn't suppose you had."

"And you haven't changed a bit about your ideas of the service?" he asked at last.

"Why should I when you look so perfectly splendid in a uniform, Taps?" she asked.
